The role of Mg in the myocardial energy metabolism. Experiments were performed to study how perfused bovine myocardium maintains its energy balance in the light of a Mg requirement. In Mg deficient medium, extracellular K⁺ was lost by an active process whereas extracellular Na⁺ was not significantly changed. Intracellular Ca²⁺ and K⁺ lost was about equally balanced by an active mechanism. The effect of the Mg deficiency on the energetic state of the myocardium was studied in the isolated perfused working heart. The decrease in contractile force was associated with a decrease in myocardial O₂ consumption. By metabolically profiling the perfusate, it was possible to quantify the differences in metabolic fluxes in normal and Mg deficient myocardium. Mg deficient tissue had a decreased lactate output (to less than 1.3 mM) and an increase in alanine release (to 1.5 mM) at any given time compared to normal tissue. The Mg deficiency, therefore, affected the energy metabolism of the myocardium. This week's Nobel Prize in chemistry has sent a mixed message about who will triumph on the science front, with the drugs that could mean the difference between life and death and progress that will ultimately make life better, and others that will make life worse. There are two big winners this year for their work on extending life, according to the science academy that awards the prize. The discovery of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) in 1983, which caused the AIDS epidemic, has been attributed to the work of a trio of men: U. T. "Dutch" van Boven, Luc Montagnier and Françoise Barré-Sinoussi (pictured above). Their invention, called the polymerase chain reaction (PCR), allowed for the first time for the accurate detection of a virus before it has a chance to multiply. PCR resulted in the rapid global eradication of smallpox in 1995 and, more recently, the discovery and eradication of the West Nile Virus in 1999. The second Nobel

Richard Malka Richard Malka (born 1969 in Washington, D.C.) is an American contemporary artist. Malka is originally from Washington, D.C. He has lived and worked in Mexico since the mid-1990s, and has taught at the Universidad de las Américas Puebla since 2003. He is represented by the Howard Greenberg Gallery in New York. Work Richard Malka was part of the New York-based groups 'Mans to Mother' from 2001 to 2004, and 'The Washington Squares'. His practice is a hybrid of figurative imagery, minimalism, computer-based art, and performance, which is influenced by both 21st Century art forms, and Asian forms of art, such as the filmic and art-of-the-invisible. Malka uses photographic and computer based technology to produce his work, making use of digital manipulation software, such as Photoshop and Paint Shop Pro, to create images which resemble traditional art forms. Using technical and digital imagery, and a text-based vocabulary, his work is informed by the concept of the border and the circulation of items within and between different cultural and historical contexts. From 1994 to 2001, Malka worked in Mexico City for the Mexican art magazine Siglo XXI and the Cultural Institute. He also studied computers at the Instituto de Artes, and at the Universidad de las Américas Puebla. In 1999 he collaborated with the 3e33713323
